Retailer 101

In a survey conducted by Kelton Global and commissioned by RetailMeNot, 40 percent of retail marketers began their promotions as early as May, and 85 percent plan to invest more in their back-to-school marketing efforts this year compared to 2016—largely by investing in mobile and social media.

- 89 percent of retailers will increase their marketing spend on mobile
- 88 percent of retailers will increase their marketing spend on social media
- 70 percent of retailers will issue mobile offers through a partner platform

More than ever, shoppers indicate they want a seamless, integrated shopping experience; yet, nearly 1 in 10 retailers indicated they do not have an omnichannel promotional plan for this season.

"Discounts and deals are incredibly important this time of year to both retailers and shoppers. Parents want to maximize their spending power and are increasingly turning to mobile as part of their shopping journey," said Marissa Tarleton, chief marketing officer, RetailMeNot. "For retail marketers, the opportunity to capitalize on omnichannel offers is more important than ever to reach consumers online, on mobile and in store. Consumers are seeking discounts, and it's imperative that retailers and brands meet them where they are with compelling content."

Consumer Report Card

With 63 percent of parents reporting they will spend more than $100 per person on back-to-school shopping, and 33 percent spending more than $250, it's no wonder that 75 percent say money is a stressor during this shopping season. Furthermore, 82 percent of parents are looking for deals.

- 36 percent of parents agree they look for more savings during back-to-school than any other time of the year
- Nearly half of shoppers (49 percent) say price is the biggest determining factor in what they buy
- 70 percent of RetailMeNot users are anticipated to look for deals on their mobile device

The shopping journey isn't limited to just one channel this season. More than half of shoppers (54 percent) surveyed do the majority of their back-to-school shopping in a physical retail location, and nearly 1 in 3 (28 percent) always search for items online before going in store.

"As we get closer to the start of school, shoppers will move from consideration to purchasing, and the retailers who have seamless experiences will benefit the most," said Tarleton.

RetailMeNot's Cheat Sheet

RetailMeNot data shows consumers are likely to do the bulk of their spending in August. Our data predicts the top shopping day will be August 5. While other top shopping days will occur in the first two weeks of August, the number two biggest back-to-school shopping day is predicted to be on Labor Day, September 4.

The back-to-school shopping time frame is the longest shopping season in the U.S., lasting nearly three months. The highest level of consumer engagement with back-to-school content on RetailMeNot happens between July 9 and September 9.

The widespread use of mobile and social to shop around means more opportunity for retailers to get in front of deal-hungry consumers before they pull out their wallets.
