In both markets online commerce and mobile retailing are accelerating and retailers are looking to drive sales and improve the customer experience for shoppers, by providing a consistent experience at all times."

Some facts about the retail industry in Spain and Italy

Spain and Italy are now the 4th and 5th largest e-commerce markets in Europe.^[1] Both markets continue to prosper (+19% growth in both markets in 2015) and offer promising prospects for retailers. While the online spend per person is still slightly lower than in the mature markets of the UK, Germany and France, Italy and Spain are among the most heavily-populated countries in Europe (60 and 47 million respectively), with high mobile connectivity and strong potential for future growth.

A recent study has revealed more than three quarters (76%) of the Spanish population regularly use the Internet, and 62% of those choose to shop online. What's more, 83% of Spanish homes have Internet access.^[2] Italians are following close behind with 61% of the Nation admitting to regularly using the Internet in 2015.

Looking more specifically at offers, coupons already have a strong appeal for both Spanish and Italian consumers. According to the research from CETELEM (<https://www.cetelem.es/banco/>), half of Spanish shoppers often use coupons and voucher codes when shopping. RetailMeNot will allow consumers to enjoy coupons and savings from leading brands and retailers, even if they have not already engaged with them.

The new entities will be operated from the company's headquarters for continentalEurope in Amsterdam, headed by Mike Lester, Vice President and General Manager, New Markets.
